Tubulin is critical in the assembly of microtubules, a protein component of the cytoskeletal structure, and in the maintenance of normal neuronal morphology. Immunohistochemical studies with tubulin antibodies have been used to investigate microtubule dynamics in differentiating neurons in the nervous system, as well as to investigate the effects of microtubule stabilizing drugs on developing neurons. In the present study, we isolated several monoclonal antibodies against β

A combined genomic and proteomic approach for the rapid identification of human adenoviruses. We used a combined genome sequencing and proteomic strategy for the rapid identification of human adenoviruses (HAdVs). Proteomic analysis of HAdV-infected cells revealed species-specific products, including 14- to 16-kDa proteins, which were only identified when HAdVs were used as a target. Subsequently, 25 HAdV strains belonging to nine species were examined by comparative genome sequencing, proteomic analysis and serologic testing. Genome sequencing and proteomic analysis identified 25 specific HAdV strains. Serologic typing of these 25 strains was also successful. Taken together, these data clearly demonstrated that the present study is a promising approach for the rapid and definitive identification of HAdVs.[The cost-effectiveness of 5 h of theophylline infusion for treatment of exercise-induced asthma in a patient with severe asthma]. Theophylline is one of the most effective agents for the treatment of exercise-induced asthma. Patients with severe asthma usually have a lower recovery rate than those with mild asthma. Thus, theophylline might be less effective for treatment in severe asthma. However, little is known about the cost-effectiveness of this regimen in severe asthma. We previously reported the effectiveness of 5 h of theophylline infusion for treatment of exercise-induced asthma in a patient with severe asthma. This patient and 6 patients with mild asthma were enrolled in the study. We evaluated the effectiveness of treatment by symptom scores and peak expiratory flow rate. Then,
